ZIONIST ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

The Zionist Active Committee at its recent session in London decided to send a commission of six experts to Palestine to investigate the economic situation and to report thereon at the forthcoming Zionist Congress.

Palestine is at present in the throes of a severe economic crisis. The most opulent European countries, and even the United States of America have had their spells of depression. The hardships are naturally felt more keenly in a young country like Palestine with its immature resistance. Besides, Palestine suffered from the fact that its recent rate of development was determined not so much by sound economic factors as by the psychology of its situation. Jews flocked to Palestine, inspired by an idealistic urge, and were able to carry on for a while on their nerve and enthusiasm alone, under conditions which lacked economic sanction.

The next Congress will naturally concern itself with the economic problems of Palestine. The last two congresses dealt at undue length with organizational politics. In order to deal effectively with the economic questions the delegates will require the submission of objective data concerning the various phases of the situation. A properly prepared report by a Committee of economic experts should serve as a basis for intelligent consideration of the problem, and for the evolution of a sound attitude and policy.

We are not familiar with the qualifications of several of the members of the commission. Suspicion is, however, invited by the appointment as one of the two American representatives of Mr. Emanuel Neumann. The commission is supposed to be composed of economic experts. Now, by no stretch of indulgence can Mr. Neumann be regarded as an economic expert. He may be a good propagandist and apologist, or an expert political tactician. But he has neither the training nor the capacity for detachment to be of great service in grappling with purely economic problems. This appointment savors too much of political favoritism, and is not calculated to inspire confidence in the sincerity of the whole project of the commission.

The question of raising a Jewish national loan was also taken up, and a proposal will be drafted for consideration at the Congress. In view of the urgent need of heroic measures in Palestine the plan of raising a large sum at one time appears to be a wise one. A substantial amount at the critical moment is worth more than an even larger sum distributed over a longer period. The Jewish nation has already a considerable amount of assets in Palestine to serve as security for a loan even on a strictly business basis. A certain amount of revenue in the national treasury is assured and a portion of the anticipated income can safely be capitalized.

ORTHODOXY BECOMES AGGRESSIVE

American Jewish Orthodoxy has launched a campaign for five million dollars to endow the new "Yeshiba-College" which is being erected in New York. The note struck at the recent conference was one of militant self-confidence. The new institution of learning is to combine the teaching of traditional Judaism with modern secular

CANADA'S POPULATION AND IMMIGRATION

By RABBI FERDINAND M. ISSERMAN

Figures published recently indicate that Canada's population has exceeded the nine million mark. A Toronto paper in a humorous column added that Canada ought to have 200,000,000 people. Exaggerated as that statement seems, yet it conveys a truth. Canada needs people badly. From all sides we hear the cry of more immigration. Frantic appeals are made in Great Britain for British immigrants to Canada. Inducements are offered by the government such as lower steamship rates, free land, etc., to prospective British settlers. But as yet we do not see the millions pouring into Canada.

A Canadian immigration policy which expends all its immigration efforts on British settlers can never be successful. Not only is the surplus population of Great Britain small, but the average inhabitant in Great Britain, even if he is dissatisfied, has no desire to migrate. He must therefore be cajoled or advertised into coming to Canada.

On the other hand there are many European countries where there are thousands of people who would welcome an opportunity of coming to Canada, of going anywhere to escape the intolerable conditions under which they live. Why are no efforts made to bring these here? Why are these even discouraged then? Is it because they are inferior? A referendum might prove them inferior—a referendum in Canada. But such a referendum would prove nothing but our own national conceit. Though the United States is guffawing and gesticulating a good deal about the type of immigrants it wants, it owes its greatness to the very nationalities it is planning to exclude.

Now the United States can make gradiose gestures. It can permit itself the luxury of racial swaggering. It has 110,000,000 people. Canada needs people and cannot indulge in such extravagances. Her problem is different from that of her southern neighbour. Imitating the United States slavishly will not help Canada. Canada needs a liberal immigration policy, admitting all human beings, who our religion teaches us were made in the image of God, with the exception of those physically, morally or mentally unfit. Such a policy would bring to Canada the people it needs, the people who will be ready to work and by whose toil and sweat Canada's assured destiny will be accelerated.

THE ORTHODOX CHIEF RABBI IN A CHURCH

Despatches which have come from England stated that the Chief Rabbi Hertz delivered an address in a church. To many Jews in Toronto this news is neither startling nor offensive. Toronto rabbis have in the past few years spoken in churches, to church bodies and even at regular church services. Ministers also have spoken from the pulpit of one of the Toronto synagogues on several occasions, There has, however, been a considerable reactionary element which has frowned on these intimate contacts between rabbi and minister and synagogue and church. They have called these experiments in fellowship as foibles of liberal Judaism, which is encouraged would break down the ancient faith.

Rabbi Gerson B. Levi, writing in the Reform Advocate, of Chicago, tells the Zionists how they could get more money for their cause by learning to speak a new language.

First of all, he wants them to stop talking about "the national Jewish homeland." To do this he feels is to invoke wrong nationalistic ideals and far-fetched cultural dreams. He points out that some of those who object to the phrase "the national Jewish homeland" do so because they object on principle to the ideal of the ethnic nationality. They know that disaster results when a nation begins to urge the ethnic national ideal. Just as they can't approve of Russia for the Russians, Germany for the Germans, America for the Americans, etc., etc., so are they unable to urge for Palestine the fulfillment of an ideal to which they have objected in the governments of other peoples. Aside from the fact that non-Zionists believe it is folly and not right to speak of the ethnic ideal as a creator of enthusasm, they also believe it unpractical. They see a time coming when the Arab will be in a position to stop immigration for, according to the mandates, the majority has a right to decide when the gates shall be shut. The non-Zionists see Palestine as part of the British Empire, a bulwark of the British domain, a frontier of British territory, part of the English plan, an economic venture, a philanthropic venture, having passed from the hope of being a state for itself and in itself.

Dr. Levi calls upon the Zionists to drop the old phrase of the Zionist propaganda, "the national Jewish homeland," to stop embellishing their appeals with misinterpretations of Jewish history, the fate of the Diaspora, or slurs on the philosophy of Reform Judaism, and also to stop saying that only in Palestine will the Jew be able to live and develop an art, a music, a literature and a sane life. All that is problematic. Dr. Levi adds that also is there no magic in the Hebrew language as far as any bearing on the ideal life is concerned. American Israel rebels at the philosophy which says that in America the Jew has no way of saving his Judaism except by waiting for the reflected light from Jews in Palestine. It certainly objects when the going to Palestine is spoken of as "going home," as if, says Dr. Levi, everywhere else the Jew builds houses and only in Palestine he builds homes.

Dr. Levi and the non-Zionists he speaks of get sick of the Shmarya Levine hyperboles. They feel that such talk is not necessary. After all, what the Zionists want most for their venture is money! That heavy golden stream which poured into Europe for Jewish war relief was obtained without invoking nationalistic ideals and money can be obtained for work in Palestine the same way. All that is necessary in order to get real money for the Palestinian economic and philanthropic venture is to show American Jewry the comparatively great unemployment and distress in Palestine where thousands of Jews who have gone to live and gain livelihoods have struck a crisis. Or that some Jews want to go there because they can have better homes than in the old lands of Europe. It is not necessary to introduce philosophy about the culture that is to be developed there and its possible effect on world Jewry. It is enough to say that with help many lives can be saved and the future of thousands be made secure by the settlement of some Jews in Palestine. Dr. Levi urges the creation of an emergency fund now. In the meantime the non-partisan investigating committee should appraise the Palestinian situation so that American Jewry will be able to decide quietly and systematically what should be done about settling a part of the Jewish Diaspora in Palestine.

What Dr. Levi has to say should be listened to attentively at all times. Without bombast, he is one of the real thinkers in American Jewry and he always strikes the note of common sense. What he says about the attitude of the non-Zionists deserves pause from the Zionists who often talk so loudly and so ardently and so impatiently that they have never yet heard the other side. If the non-Zionists or anti-Zionists are thought not to listen to the Zionists, no one can say that the Zionists want to hear any voice except their own. Occasionally, for the sake of their cause, they should at least read while they run.

The House with the Red Shield

By JENNIE FRANKLIN PURVIN

By a chain of fortuitous circumstances we have come to the old city of Frankfort on the Main on the eve of a great Jewish holiday. We are therefore to have the unique privilege of attending holy day services in a synagogue which will prove of great interest to us. In order to prepare ourselves for a proper understanding of its history we go, shortly after our arrival, into the old quarter of this busy town that we may find the "Judengasse" of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The Jews of Frankfort have suffered the severities of fate more often than they have enjoyed its amenities. For many generations they have been known to dwell in this city. Sometimes they enjoyed the protection of the rulers of the land; equally often they were the scapegoats of rulers' pleasures. Today they might be a prosperous community; tomorrow they might be cut down by the ruthless hand of an oppressor or a merciless tax-gatherer. In the morning they might be peacefully at work, applying themselves to such trades as they were permitted to pursue; in the evening their street upon which stood all the houses of the community might lie in ashes as the result of accidental or premeditated destruction. With each change of royal authority in the district might come new policies and the Jew never knew whether he was to be granted the opportunity to serve his ruler or whether he was to be buffeted about the land. The picture is not unlike that which many another old city in Europe might paint; the only difference is that here in Frankfort the history of the Jew is a long and continuous one.

In one particular the history of the Jewish community of Frankfort is unique. This city marks the birthplace of the founder of that great family of financiers which has made for itself perhaps the most conspicuous place which any single household has established in many generations. Once upon a time the various houses which the Jews occupied in the old Judengasse of Frankfort had various emblems on the doors to set apart in one way or another the occupants therein. On one such dwelling there was a red shield. Then came the day when each family was known by its distinguishing design and they who lived in the house numbered one hundred forty-eight were promptly named after the "rothen Schild" upon their dwelling.

It is to this old house that we pilgrim promptly upon our arrival in Frankfort that we may see, with typical American curiosity, the birthplace of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, a small merchant and money-changer, whose son, Amschel Mayer Rothschild, was the real founder of the enormous banking house which the various members of the family have since established in the capitals of Europe. The building is still in the possession of the family. It is only one in a row of old dwellings, now in the congested part of the city. Business has sprung up all about it. One can hardly imagine it to be a pleasant place in which to live, even for persons of modest means. But family sentiment is protecting it and for sentimental reasons we may hope that this will long be the case.

Judah Philip Benjamin, "Brains of the Confederacy," Jurist and Statesman

By ALEX. J. WHYNMAN

It was recently announced that a gift of $50,000 was anonymously given to the Harvard Law School endowment fund in honour of that eminent jurist and statesman, Judah Philip Benjamin. The name of Benjamin recalls a Jew of unusual character, a man of great genius and of the undying spirit of a warrior. His career was unique—unique indeed in its success and the circumstances under which that success was attained. Because he was on the losing side of the great Civil War, historians have been less inclined to give emphasis to the remarkable part he played in the Confederacy and have been reluctant to indicate other brilliant episodes of his career. The announcement of that gift should serve to recall not only Benjamin's great legal ability but also his services as a statesman.

After completing three years of study at Yale, Benjamin went to New Orleans to study law in a notary's office. It was not long before he became a leading member of the bar and known as "the commercial lawyer of New Orleans." In the early days of his career, Benjamin indeed helped the members of his profession by publishing a "Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of Louisiana." Its value in a judicial system—where judges' decisions, to a large extent, are based on precedents and where lawyers must look to prior reports in order to advise clients—is inestimable.

Since Benjamin was a lawyer, it is not surprising to find that he entered politics. It is interesting to note that he never tasted defeat in any election, although he had many close battles. He served in the Louisiana State Assembly, and later as a member of the State Constitutional Convention he played a prominent part in framing the new State Constitution. In 1850, while a member of the State Senate, his Whig colleagues found him to be the strongest candidate for the United States Senate. Accordingly he was nominated and finally elected to that office, receiving many votes from the Democratic minority in the State Legislature, since the seventeenth amendment providing for popular election of United States Senators did not become operative till 1913.

Benjamin came to Washington when the slavery question was nearing its height. In that city he was well known, for he had appeared as counsel quite frequently before the Supreme Court and was early recognized as one of the leaders of the American Bar. It was said that President Pierce offered him a place on the United States Supreme Court but that the eminent lawyer had declined the honour.

Benjamin won the reputation of being a brilliant orator, and Charles Sumner, his constant opponent in politics, thought him the most eloquent speaker there. As a statesman, the brilliant gentleman from Louisiana was a product of his environment; sectional, a profound believer in state sovereignty, he was one of the South's staunchest supporters of slavery. He never hesitated to come to the defense of his people. His earnestness brought him many enemies and once a member of the Senate alluded to him sneeringly as "that Jew from Louisana." In reply, Benjamin said: "That gentleman, forgetting his honourable and exalted position, has stooped so low as to assail me on the point of my religious faith. Sneeringly he calls me a Jew. Well sir, I am a Jew. But (shaking his finger at the Senator) when his ancestors were herding swine upon the plains of Scandinavia, mine were following the Maccabees to victory."

After the election of Lincoln he opposed war except as a last resort; but, believing that that point had been reached, he became a leading figure in the Confederate government, and throughout the conflict was Jefferson Davis' most intimate and useful advisor. He was generally described as the "brains of the Confederacy."

As an eminent lawyer, Benjamin first served as attorney-general of the Confederacy. However he soon became Secretary of War, for Walker (the first secretary) finding himself unequal to the task, resigned. He re-organized the department, which was in a chaotic state; but his indifference to the clamors of the press made him more "unpopular than his necessarily unpopular duties required." Finally he relinquished that office after facing a Congressional inquiry. As matters developed later, there is no doubt but that he could have defended himself had he cared to; but, feeling as he did, that in so doing he might give the Yankees information which would greatly imperil the Southern cause, he declined to offer any testimony which would

It is to be expected that the residents of Frankfort will speak with pleasure of the contribution which the presence of the Rothschild family has made to the stability of Judaism in their city. Indeed, the Jew is a very active person still in this community. His ranks are sharply divided into different factions but they are all lively ones. Small wonder when we remember that Frankfort has not only given birth to a great and noble family of Jews, but it has not only had a long and interesting history, but that it also had for a very long time one of the most famous of Hebrew presses and book shops. Even now the student has recourse to the old bookstalls in this city in his effort to find copies of volumes old and new, which will add to his collection of things Judaic.

Anti-Semitism is far from unknown in this part of the world. We are therefore not surprised to hear that the division between Zionists and non-Zionists is very clearly marked. We have arrived just in time to watch the campaigning which is being done by both factions because the Jewish community is soon to decide by ballot whether or not it will support the Palestinian movement. It seems to be the endless question, bothering us on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, as to whether or not a Jew may be a full-fledged citizen of the country of his birth if he professes an interest in the "homeland" of the people who were his very remote progenitors. And in the face of the ill-feeling manifest against the native-born German of Jewish ancestry by those Germans of Christian stock who seem to feel that they have a prior claim upon Teutonic culture, the question becomes a very vital one. And we know that no matter what side may win now in the semi-legal election nothing will be settled the debate is one which will be continued, not only here but everywhere, for many decades to come.

We have an unusual amount of interest in the religious service we are now to attend. Friends are making it possible for us to obtain seats in the "Great Synagogue"; not an easy task, it seems, since at this time of the year, here as elsewhere, seats are at a premium; and some kind woman is good enough to relinquish her place that it may be occupied by an American. What does the American find? From our viewpoint rather a unique situation. The building into which we are ushered is a very large one, externally at least. It is far from beautiful, for only the rarest Jewish house of worship in Europe lays any claim to beauty in architecture. This place follows the conventional style. Its interior is rectangular; the decorations are plain; there is no attempt at ornateness; the altar is in no way especially attractive. The gallery in which still sit the women is unusually high above the main floor so that the ceiling of the building is so far above the level of the auditorium as to give the whole place an uncanny appearance. The women must take most of the service for granted in this house of worship. So poorly is the rectangular building planned that all who sit in the gallery seats of the first two rows are entirely cut off from any sight of the man below, be he, Rabbi, altar included. When the "shamus" was not on the side of the house whither we had been consigned, we left the hard wooden bench temporarily and stole down to the first row of aisle in order to get some idea of what was going on. There seemed to be much moving about the high altar and the steps leading up to it; first this man and then that one would take part of the chanting and the reading; there must be a number of officials, for all were evidently authorised to conduct the service. The audience of men and boys was a most prosperous-looking one. Hats were quite the proper thing to have on, prayer shawls were very beautiful in appearance and texture and were; one could not escape the thought that he was in the presence of the successful men who are the followers of the Rothschild tradition.

From a religious viewpoint, however, it was an unfortunate choice for an American. The service was too unlike any we are familiar with to give it any feeling of intimacy; it sounded perfunctory and formal, with the result that we were led to debate once more whether it is not better to remain away from the synagogue rather than to make the effort to sit through a service foreign and therefore unsympathetic. There have been orthodox rituals which we have heard in various places in Europe sufficiently appealing to catch our modern minds; this was none such; it did not ring true; at least, not to our understanding thoughts. And the restlessness of the audience gave one the impression that even among those who did understand the prayers, attention was not altogether riveted upon them. We were pleased when the service came to an end and we could without qualms of conscience watch these religious confrères of ours as they wended their way out of the building.

What to do with the afternoon of a great holiday when one is far from home and friends is a problem in itself. For typical sightseeing, for "shopping" or even for sitting about in the cafes one has not the inclination. We utilize the hours, therefore, in visiting the Staedler Art Gallery, one of the most desirable smaller collections in Europe. It is an appropriate one at this hour, too, for its most renowned picture is a very large canvas by the great Rembrandt, depicting the blinding of Samson It is a mighty portrayal in the artist's most vigorous manner and crowds into the confines of one painting the whole gory story of the strong man and his end at the hands of the Philistines. Other pictures of note are here too, especially the well-known portrait of Bismark by von Lenbach. What attracts us most, however, is a large loan collection of the etchings and drawings of Rembrandt himself, exhibited in periods, showing the deveopment of this greatest of all etchers of his time. Good luck has brought the exhibit here when we too are passing through, for a few hours spent in detailed study of line and motion is not only absorbing in attention but it is also an opportunity to learn something more about the baffling art of the etcher's needle.

How often in these old German towns one wishes he had the ability to set down in drawing his impression of their quaintness. For the large part Frankfort is

GOLDEN ORANGES

The Very Heart of Orange-CRUSH

No wonder children love it

First the juice of luscious oranges—the delicate flavor of their peel—the zestful tang of the fruit acid found in oranges, lemons and limes—a pure food color, such as you use in your cakes and candies—pure cane sugar, carbonated water.

WHEREVER there's thirst there's Orange-CRUSH. Popular everywhere you are, anywhere you go. But be sure that you get Orange-CRUSH when you ask for it.

Identify it by the name Orange-CRUSH blown right into the bottle.

Give the little folks all the Orange-CRUSH they want because it has real food value. A 6-oz. Krinkly Bottle of Orange-CRUSH has food value, as measured in food calories, equal to 1½ times that found in a medium-sized, fresh, ripe orange.

of course a very modern town; but there remains the one district around the old "Roemer" which is an unqualified joy to behold; the little houses with their gabled roofs and fancily decorated façades are jolly reminders once more of the day when individuality other than ours set forth one building from another. Centering around the fine old building in whose great hall German princes and rulers once made history are a half dozen streets still filled with the original homes of the burghers who once lived here. The fine old cathedral with its top-heavy dome seems little the worse for the wear of the centuries. The court house bears so distinct a stamp of majesty upon its exterior that we look up at the broad flight of stairs expecting the doors at their head to open and some royally robed figure to come through the portals to make us welcome.

We do not await this formal greeting. As the holy day draws to a close we find our way to the well-known "palm garten" where in the midst of beautiful surroundings we may again listen to good music. It is always at the twilight hour that our thoughts stray homewards and obviously at this time we are thinking more than ever of the loved ones who unite with us though far across the sea, in celebrating one of Israel's great days of memories. Now we could easily answer the oft-times baffling question as to what composes the "Jewish consciousness"; it is that indescribable something which draws every Jew toward every other Jew of his kind, against the odds of distance and circumstance. On this account did we willingly sit through a religious service so different from any we might be willing to join with at home; on this account did we willingly set aside a precious day in a foreign land for reminiscence and rest; on this account do we now feel a certain glow of pride in the accomplishments of that great family of Jews which counts its origin from the little house with the red shield in the Jüdengasse of Frankfort. Try as we will to resist the impulse, we are never free from the subconscious desire to know the Jewish interests of each place as we pass. Nor is this something to be regretted, for it doubles the interest of the tourist, if he be of Hebraic origin; especially in the town of Frankfort which has a Jewish community of historical significance. Happy are we to have come upon it at so auspicious an hour.

Ego

By MILLIE COWEN

"My Abie! He's so smart!" Maternal love and pride shone divinely from Mrs. Degen's eyes. Strangers wondered whether he was two or ten. When enlightened as to his thirty-odd years they smiled and made allowances. Abie was of the same opinion as his mother. The sense of superiority she had fostered in him had borne fruit. He knew he was smart. He knew everything. Everything! He volunteered graciously to tell the unknowing how far Betelguese was from the earth, how the stock market was going, whether it was a bumper year for crops, who was going to be the next president, whether prohibition was saving or ruining the country. One thing he didn't know—himself.

"He wouldn't be half bad if only some one would come along and take a little of the wind out of his sails."

"Hopfen and Malz verdorben! No one ever will. He's so conceited that I doubt if he thinks anyone else on earth counts. Perhaps if he married the right sort of girl—"

Jen Karpen was the prettiest girl in town. And not only pretty but charming, and best of all absolutely unconscious of her attractiveness. According to the law of opposites it was inevitable that she and Abie should be mutually attracted. Jen showed her admiration openly.

"I call it meshugge for a girl like Jen to throw herself away on a Shlemiel like Abie."

"They're not engaged, are they?"

"No, but anyone can see how the wind blows."

Everyone was surprised—save Abie. Why shouldn't she like him? There wasn't a girl in his set who wouldn't be honoured by his attentions. The worst of it was that he really believed it. When Jen discovered how things were, she woke from her dream of love with a shock. So he thought she was as east as all that! If she hadn't loved him, matters would have culminated swiftly. But she did love him and she did want to marry him. Only she wanted to be the bestower of favours, and not the recipient. She set her keen mind to workd. She'd teach this self-confident young man a lesson.

So when Abie, after a delightful evening at the theatre, said to her with calm self-assurance:

"When shall we get married, Jen?" she stared at him in well-feigned amazement.

"Married? What in the world are you talking about?"

"I thought I made it plain by my attentions that I wanted to marry you."

"I took your attentions as an evidence of friendship, Abe. I'm very sorry, believe me, if I led you to think—I haven't any idea of getting married to you—or to anyone else for that matter just as present."

His incredulous look made her want to laugh, or to shake him. Not for nothing had she studied psycho-analysis. She could almost follow the workings of his brain. Not want to marry him—Abe Degen! Why, the girl must be crazy. And everyone knew how he had rushed her—everyone was expecting the announcement of the engagement. They'd know she had jilted him! What a Shande!

Her soft voice broke in on his troubled thoughts.

"It's certainly no calamity, Abe. There are plenty of other girls."

Abe swallowed hard. For the moment he forgot himself, forgot what others would say, and remembered only that he loved this girl better even than he loved himself.

"But—but, Jen, don't you see, I don't want other girls. I want you."

"I'm sorry, Abe—really—"

The ringing of the telephone interrupted her. She had timed the call with malice aforethought.

"Hello, Herman."

"I'll be delighted to go."

"I'll be ready punctually at eight. Good-bye."

Abie, crestfallen, had risen to go. Jen turned on him, all sweetness.

"Can't we be friends—just friends, Abe?"

He couldn't let her go entirely. Perhaps some spark of hope still lingered.

"Yes, Jen.

It was a chastened Abie who went about his daily tasks. The face of all the world was changed. His provocative self-assurance was gone. At a big rally meeting for charity Abie was conspicuously silent. Usually his opinions were proclaimed at length in no uncertain tone.

Jen became alarmed. Perhaps the cure was worse than the disease. Even his pompous self-satisfaction was better than this meek indifference and humility. She blamed herself. She mustn't let it go too far. She stood it as long as she could and then she rang him up at his office.

"Hello, Abe."

"Haven't seen you for so long! Could you come to dinner to-night?"

His eager expectation was pitiful. A month before he would have said indifferently:

"There are so many demands on my time, but if I can get out of a pressing engagement I'll come, but I won't promise."

And to-day—

"I'll be glad to come, Jen, if you really want me."

How much she wanted him Jen hesitated to acknowledge herself. How much she missed his attentions! But how gather up spillled milk? She'd try.

Her prettiest dress! An appetizing dinner!

He gazed at her as of old, but she knew he wouldn't ask her again—that he was afraid.

"Rabbi Gerson is a fine fellow. I'm going to have him marry me."

"So you are going to be married?"

"Yes."

"When?" miserably..

"As soon as the man I love asks me again," emphasizing the "again."

Abie started. And of a sudden he understood.

"Do you mean it?" eagerly.

"Yes," softly.

He drew her to him.

"I knew you didn't mean it when you refused me—that you were just timid, afraid you couldn't meet my desires. But it's all right, dearest. As my wife, you'll have an assured position."

And she thought she had cured him!

She never murmured even when she heard her future mother-in-law say:

"Yes, my Abie's going to get married. Not that she's good enough for him, but she just ran after him. You know these girls nowadays. She's lucky I tell you, to get my Abie."

"The circle is complete"

Starting out some years ago, laundries established research departments to determine the most efficient methods of handling "family wash." After exhaustive experimenting it has been found that the housewife was right after all and, after travelling around the circle, are to-day coming as nearly as possible to good soap, soft water and many rinsings. This laundry has advanced one step further and introduced the 24-hour "super-speed" service, whereby your family wash is collected to-day and returned to you to-morrow. Four other specialized services give you any degree of "wash" help you may possibly require. Perhaps you would like to chat with our young lady who explains these things and our reasonable prices. Rabbi Isserman's Editorial

For the benefit of these, we hold up the example of the English Chief Rabbi, a militant orthodox leader, who yet addressed a church body. True, this was his first appearance in a church. But we hope it will not be the last. Better fellowship between followers and teachers of great religions is going to prevail—must prevail. The exchange of pulpits, the visit of the Jew to the church and the Christian to the synagogue, these enhance the spirit of fellowship. Such an exchange of courtesies makes for a finer mutual appreciation which is highly desirable. Not tolerance between Jew and Christian should be the goal, but appreciation of Christianity by the Jew and of Judaism by the Christian. It is because the chief rabbi's visit to a church is a tangible expression of such appreciation that we hail it as an important event.

scholarships. The leaders feel that the two types of lore are not contradictory.

It strikes us that the main difficulty which Orthodoxy has to contend with is to evolve a harmony between its creeds and the solvent elements of modern life. It is easy enough to work out a synthesis between science and traditionalism. The real task is to make the observance of traditionalism practicable in life. A.B.B.

MELBOURNE SYNAGOGUE DEDICATED

A new synagogue was recently dedicated in Melbourne, Australia, in the presence of more than 1,000 persons. The dedication ceremonies were conducted by Rev. J. Dangelow and Rabbi Francis Cohen, of Sidney, and of the local ministers. Sir John Monash was among the honoured guests at the celebration.

Sir John Monash, who had such a splendid record during the war, was the recipient of an illuminated address, which was presented to him by the City Council of Melbourne. The Lord Mayor made the presentation and spoke in the highest terms of admiration and praise of the great heroism of Sir John Monash. This belated honour was given to him now, because he innocently asked of the city clerk for a copy of a record of a telegram which he had received in France in 1918. Instead of giving him the copy asked for, the City Council decided to make the presentation to him in a more formal manner.

Battling with the Economic Crisis in Palestine

The meeting of the executive committee of the Zionist organization, which was held in London a few weeks ago, had under consideration chiefly the problems resulting from the present economic crisis in Palestine. The conditions are summarized by a correspondent of the London Jewish Chronicle as follows: "With the sole exception of the orange trade, business is at a standstill. Many concerns are in a state of crisis, and a large number have been totally ruined. The big 'Manor' textile factory scheme is dead. Industrial enterprises which have existed for years have suspended work or reduced production. A number of business premises and shops, especially in Tel Aviv, are standing empty. Business men are complaining that they are not earning anything. The school teachers have received no salaries for the past three months. As many as 7,000 workers are unemployed and are living as best they can on the dole given them by the Zionist Executive—twenty-five piaster a week for an unmarried man and fifty piaster for one who has a wife and family. There are, in addition, 10,000 middle class families in the country who are not earning anything. In order to assist these, the Jewish communal organizations have intensified their relief activities as in the years immediately following the British occupation. The Chasidic colonies are also in difficulties and have added to the crisis. The position of the Agudas Israel colony is no better. There is no money anywhere, not in the towns, nor in the villages. Everybody is in debt, and taxation is heavier than ever."

This is rather a gloomy picture and is probably much overdrawn. That the situation is quite serious and demands careful handling has been brought out very clearly at the meeting of the Zionist Executive. The decision reached to begin at once some large constructive work by which employment may be found for a large number of the present unemployed will be welcomed by the Palestine inhabitants, since the palliative measures followed hitherto have been inadequate and against the spirit and feelings of the new settlement. Of the causes enumerated, the most important is undoubtedly the shortage of ready cash. Palestine needs a minimum of twenty-five million dollars a year for a period of a number of years until it becomes well established. So far not quite one-eighth of that amount has been raised during the past six years.

It is natural that criticism should be levelled at the Zionist organization for failing to foresee such an emergency and providing for it. This is to be expected, since the Zionist organization is the responsible agency and the only one known to the masses of the Jewish population. On the other hand, the Zionist organization, without wishing to shift the responsibility, is pointing to the insurmountable difficulties which it had to encounter, and finds that the great cause of its present predicament is due to the half-hearted support given to the Palestine Jewish settlement by the British authorities. On his arrival in London, Mr. Lipsky, in an interview printed in a leading London journal, arraigned the British Government and the Palestine Administration in unmistakable terms for their failure in doing all that they could do to facilitate the upbuilding of the land by the Jewish pioneers. Mr. Lipsky's statement, although couched in friendly and temperate language, aroused the indignation of the "Near East," a semi-official organ of the British Government. The right of an American Jew to criticize the policy of England is challenged and it is asserted that such provocation may do more harm than good. It is further hinted that had the American Jews made greater progress with the establishment of the agency, the criticism would have been more in place.

Fortunately it has become known that the reports circulated a few weeks ago that the proposed Palestine loan, for twenty-two and a half million dollars, which passed the British Parliament, would be delayed, was without foundation. The loan was to be guaranteed by the British Treasury and was to be used especially in the construction of the Haifa harbour and other improvements of a permanent character. The loan has thus far not been issued because it has not yet been decided which of the various Haifa harbour projects is to be carried out, and therefore work thereon, for which the loan is primarily intended, cannot be started. As soon as a decision is reached, the loan will be issued.

NORTHERN ONTARIO CANADA

Northern Ontario, now open for settlement at fifty cents per acre, contains millions of acres of the finest agricultural land in the world. Its resources in lumber, minerals, water, power, fish, game and scenery are immense. The land calls for men to cultivate it, and in return will give health, comfort and prosperity.

What settlers say of the soil, climate, farming and forest life, is told in a most attractive booklet issued under the direction of the Honourable John S. Martin, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. Full instructions in regards to acquiring a title to these rich agricultural lands are also given.

Judah Philip Benjamin

exonerate him from blame. Davis, however, never for a moment lost confidence in his most trusted advisor and later appointed him Secretary of State. The Southern hero retained the latter office till the end of the war, when, fearing arrest by Northern officials, he made his escape to England with difficulty.

England extended a warm welcome to the Confederate leader, who desired to practice law in that land as he had done in the United States and who refused for that reason many lucrative offers to enter the field of journalism. But to be admitted to the bar necessitated several years of work, which corresponds in this country to a clerkship. That a man of fifty-four, who had previously led such an energetic life and who had to start life anew in a foreign country after four years of nerve-racking activity during the Civil War, should refuse easier means of earning a livelihood in order to practice law in a strange land—is indeed an unusual manifestation of the strong will and limitless pluck.

Because, however, of his recognized ability, the usual clerkship was greatly shortened for Benjamin; in 1866 he was called to the bar of England. That dispensation is indeed most astonishing, and is a great tribute to the man for this reason: It was only in 1833 that a Jew, Mr. (afterwards Sir) Francis Goldsmid was called to the bar of England. There was no legislative disability imposed upon Jews desiring to enter the legal profession, but Lincoln's Inn, free to use its discretion, never called one until 1833. The fact that only thirty years after this disability had been removed this courtesy was extended to Benjamin, a Jew, is certainly a reflection upon his rare character and remarkable ability, as well as a tribute to the magnanimity of the British bar.

Shortly after his admittance to the bar, Benjamin published a book on "The Law of Sales," which may well be described as the most successful and classical legal text-book of the nineteenth century. He supplied a great need to his profession, as he had done once before when he published the Digests in Louisiana for the subject of "Sales" had not previously been adequately treated.

Benjamin soon received the "Patent of Precedence" and in 1872 was made a Queen's counsel. At that time those who desired the latter honour had to write to the Lord Chancellor expressing a wish for such a position. Benjamin's appointment, however, was not so obtained. When Lord Chancellor Cairns heard him present a case in court, he was so impressed that he inquired whether the eminent jurist desired to be appointed one of her Majesty's counsel. This honour Benjamin gladly accepted, and before long rose to the foremost rank of the English bar. That a man should hold such conspicuous leadership at the bar of two countries is certainly a record that has never hitherto been surpassed.

Prior to his retirement from practice, a farewell dinner was given to Benjamin by the bench and bar of England, in the hall of the Inner Temple, London, on June 30, 1883. That honour had been accorded previously to only two other great lawyers. Over two hundred of the leading judges and members of the bar came to do honour to the culmination of so brilliant a career. Many a rival must have been overcome in the course of Benjamin's rise, yet no one manifested any ill-feeling. Attorney-General Sir Henry James, the toastmaster on that occasion, among other things said: "He knocked at our doors and they were widely opened to him. We found place for him in our foremost rank, we grudged him not the leadership he so easily gained, we were proud of his success, for we knew the strength of the stranger among us, and the bar is ever generous even in its rivalry towards success that is based on merit. And the merit must have been there for who is the man save this one of whom it can be said that he held conspicuous leadership at the bar of two countries."
